

I would like the FCC to reconsider the plan of preempting state Telephone Privacy laws. The attempt to standardize across the nation adds no practical value to the end consumer (me) but instead favors the business community. The plan does not have any provisions to allow a nationwide 'do not call' list. The FCC needs to ask the question why would a consumer want to be contacted by a business for the only reason that I might have happen to buy a product from them using my credit card. If I wanted additional support from the business, I want to initiate it. (Not the other way around.)

There are so many other tools available to businesses for broadcasting their goods and services. Let them explore those options instead. I thank the FCC for its time.
